Where there's nonconformity, there's difference. When everyone is acting or dressing exactly the same, there's conformity, not nonconformity. Nonconformity means that someone is doing things differently from the norm. People in authority tend to dislike nonconformity, because it makes people harder to control. Someone who demonstrates nonconformity most of the time is a nonconformist. Too much nonconformity can create chaos, but without a little nonconformity, life would be pretty boring. Part A: Define Conformity and Non-Conformity Conformity is defined as the compliance with social standards and laws in a particular culture, environment, society and time. If this occurs the individual changes their attitudes, beliefs or actions to align more holistically with those in the surrounding groups and environment, as a result of real or perceived group pressure. This is ultimately a direct result of the power which a group has over the individual. There are two types of conformity, normative conformity, and informational conformity. Normative conformity is motivated by the desire to be liked and accepted in society. This is most widely known as peer pressure. For example, a student begins smoking because their peers are smoking...show more content...When the movie is finished, all your friends were saying how much they liked it. In this instance, if you were to suppress your own opinion and say that you liked the movie, you would be conforming. In contrast, non-conformity is a deviation from social norms. This transpires when a person violates the expectations and norms of a group. This repeatedly occurs when a person chooses to act upon their own thoughts and intuition, in opposition to the expectations of the group, society, and culture in which they live. An example of non-conformity is attending a wedding and wearing only casual clothes when everybody else is dressed...show more content...For example, on the night of December 22nd, 2002, the Bra Boys had an altercation with off-duty members of the local police force. This event has ultimately resulted in the Bra Boy group being labelled as rebellious, young teens with criminal tendencies by some in the wider society. However, this view was challenged as a result of the actions of the Bra Boys during the Cronulla Riot. In this instance, the leaders of the Bra Boys were a crucial part in instigating the eventual peace between the Australian and Lebanese communities. As a result, the wider community now perceived the Bra Boys as respectful young adults, who valued equality between different cultures. From these instances, it is clear that the behaviours and values of the Bra Boys have influenced the way in which they are perceived by the wider society to a great extent, serving to both reinforce the negative stereotype surrounding the group, as well as challenge it and portray the group in a new Nonconformity in ISO 9001 is failure to meet a requirement, realizing and defining the problem, containing the problem, determining its cause and taking appropriate action to prevent it happening again. When a company is ISO 9001 certified, there is a specific set of regulations that must be followed in order to conform with the guidelines. In the event that one of these mandatory requirements are not being followed, the company or individual will be considered noncompliant. Keep reading to find out what is considered to be nonconformity in ISO 9001, as well as what happens after the violation has been recognized. Nonconformity In ISO 9001 Nonconformity in terms of ISO 9001 is defined as the failure to meet one or more requirements that are outlined throughout the mandatory clauses. To get more into detail on the topic, nonconformity can refer to the requirements of a regulatory body, the organization itself, or even the customers of the business. ISO 9001 Nonconformity: Failure to meet one or more requirements Requirements of ISO, business procedures, or customers Nonconformity can be anything from the company's individual procedures to the quality standards that must be upheld in order to satisfy the customer base. In the event that there are any violations of ISO 9001, there are a few actions that should be taken thereafter. What is Non-conformance? There are two different types of nonconformity that can be identified, which are referred to as major and minor non-conformances. A minor non-conformance is an event or action that is outside of the ISO 9001 requirements. However, this type of violation does not have any dire consequences to the way the business operates nor does it cause any major effects. A major non-conformance, on the other hand, is identified when where is a huge violation of the business' QMS, preventing the entire company from meeting the requirements outlined in ISO 9011 guidelines. For example, if the company personnel failed to take corrective action on an area of the business that was not compliant with ISO regulations or just failed to implement the standards in the first place, this would be considered a major non-conformance What Happens After Nonconformity is Identified: A non-conformance report (NCR) is filled out The auditee is informed of the contents of the report Plan of action is established to prevent nonconformity When nonconformity is identified in a business, there are a few things that will take place in order to get the company back on track. First of all, a non-conformance report (NCR) will be filled out by the supervising personnel. Once the person who is being audited has been informed of the contents of the report, a plan of action is establishes and carried out in order to prevent future nonconformity. The details of the processes that go into reporting and correcting ISO nonconformity will be described in detail within the next few sections. Keep reading to get a better idea of what this looks like within an ISO 9001 certified company. Reporting ISO 9001 Nonconformity When nonconformity occurs within a business, there is something called a non-conformance report (NCR) that is filled out to notify the violator of the issue at hand in explicit detail in order to begin to repair the problem. The NCR is created in the form of a document, and is meant to be constructive, allowing the person who is being notified to be able to make changes and move into the right direction. In order to create a detailed and effective non-conformance report, there are four main points that need to be addressed, as outlined in the ISO 9001 Nonconformity clause. These NCR requirements are outlined below, and explained more in detail throughout the rest of this section. Non-conformance Report: Requirement that is being violated by non-conformance Event/action that went wrong to cause the NCR Plan of action to prevent future problems Explanation of the action that will be taken to correct non-conformance The first item that must be included in a non-conformance report is the specific requirement that is being violated by the non-conformance Basically, the report must indicate which rule or regulation from ISO 9001 is being broken, which will be the reason why it is being written in the first place. Along with the requirement that is being violated, the actual event or act that went wrong to cause the NCR to be written up must also be indicated in the report to notify the company personnel of what they have done incorrectly to cause the violation. Next, and most importantly, a plan of action to prevent future problems of similar nature must be written on the report. Since Non-conformance reports are meant to be solution-oriented, there must be some kind of positive action recorded on the document. To be more specific, non-conformance reports are not a notification of an employee being fired, put on suspension, or otherwise placed on any kind of punishment per say. They are meant to help the business improve as a whole, by assisting every member of the company in becoming fully compliant with the ISO 9001 regulations. The NCR could be considered a warning to the non-complaint employee, that outlines a detailed process on how they can correct their actions and avoid making the same mistakes in the future. The plan of action must be accompanied by a more in-depth explanation of the steps that will be taken to fix the non-conformance Suggestions for Writing NCR: Write clearly Address everything that is required Keep the non-conformance statement general to highlight the specific issue Write the more specific details in the objective evidence area only When it comes to writing an effective NCR, there are a few tips that you will want to keep in mind to get your point across clearly and gain the best results afterward. First of all, you will want to write clearly so that the auditee will be aware of the issue that has occurred. Along with addressing everything that is required in the report as mentioned in the list above, you will want to keep the non-conformance statement as general as possible. Even though the report itself should be very detailed, you should write the most specific information in the area that is designated for the objective evidence. The beginning of the report where you explain the regulation that has been violated should be written in generic terms in order to highlight the specific issue at hand, instead of confusing them with big words and distracting from the main idea of the report. How to Correct a Nonconformity While it is important to avoid nonconformity in a business at all costs, there will be some instances where mistakes can happen and rules can be broken for whatever reason. Instead of dwelling on the fact that an employee or certain area of the business is not currently conforming to ISO 9001 regulations, it is important to immediately come up with a plan and take action to fix the issue. In this section, we will go over the process that should take place in the event that nonconformity occurs anywhere within a company. Corrective Action: Review efficiency of corrective actions taken Completing a review of actions Meeting, observing, or following up with auditees Documenting all nonconformities, actions, and results As mentioned previously, a report must be written up in the event of any nonconformities within the business. In this report, there are detailed steps of how the problem will be solved. While correcting the non-conformance, the efficiency of the corrective actions outlined in the report should be reviewed. Additionally, the auditees should be met with, observed, or followed up with to make sure the problem does not persist. Throughout this entire process, everything should be documented for accuracy, effectiveness, and future reference. As you can see, nonconformity of ISO 9001 is something that occurs when regulations are not being followed, however there are plenty of actions to take in order to fix the problem and prevent any future ones.
